TRU's billion-dollar Reach into the future

MULTI-DECADE PLANNED COMMUNITY ON CAMPUS MODELLED AFTER SFU, UBC SITES

Thompson Rivers University has taken the first step in a $1-billion project to create a village on campus.

The concept, called the community trust, will combine office, retail and residential space, creating a "vibrant neighbourhood" where you can live, work, study and play 24/7," said TRU president Alan Shaver.

The first request for proposals has been sent to 25 developers in the province. About a dozen have already replied, expressing interest in the first phase.

That would see an estimated 90,000 square feet of residential and market condominium housing built on land on University Drive on the north side of the Old Main Building.

The project is being done through the university's community trust. The land will be leased to developers with revenue going to student assistance and funding research, said Christopher Seguin, the university's vice-president advancement.

Frank Quinn, chief of the community trust board, said the estimated value of the project is based on the cost to build, a figure he pegged at $200 per square foot.

Once complete, the Reach will add three million square feet of residential living space, 40,000 square feet of new office space and 70,000 square feet of new retail space. The university has about 90 acres on which the village can be built.

It will be similar to developments at the University of British Columbia and Simon Fraser University.

Quinn hopes construction can begin within 12 months on the project he predicted "will change the face not only of the university but of the city."

He said building a community will end the "drive in, drive out, lights off" reality that now exists on campus and see activities happening into the evening.

Quinn also sees the project as a way to attract students and perhaps encourage them to remain in Kamloops after graduating.

Seguin agreed with Quinn, noting a get-together at TRU in the evening.
