By EDGAR RICE BURROUGHS

"I created a new race—men-gorillas," the creature chuckled. "I gave them laws, a royal family and a nobility. I became their God—their Maker!" "But you? Rhonda asked; "you are not human. You are part gorilla. How could you have been an Englishman?"

"I am an Englishman nevertheless," the half-beast replied. "Once I was a very handsome Englishman. But old age overtook me. I felt my powers failing. I saw the grave beckoning. I sought some means to prolong my life, to bring back youth. At last I was successful."

"I discovered how to detach body cells and transfer them from one individual to another. I used young gorillas of both sexes and transplanted their virile youthful body cells to my own body. I halted the ravages of old age, and thus renewed my youth."

"As the gorilla body cells multiplied, however, I began to acquire the characteristics of gorillas. Some day I shall be, to all intents and purposes, a gorilla. Or rather, I should have been, had it not been for the fortunate circumstance that brought you to me."
